Milk is where all cheese making starts. As acknowledged in the book, it is the primary building block of cheese. Milk is produced by ruminant animals (hoofed animals with multi-chambered digestive systems) as nourishment for their young but it is also used as food for humans.

Ruminant milk has a unique protein structure ... More About Milk |

Home When you've experimented at home, and are familiar with the basics of cheese making, I would then recommend a cheese-making course at The School of Artisan Food (with Ivan Larcher or Paul Thomas). As an attendee of many courses and having spoken to many participants in my time, I think that Ivan Larcher and Paul Thomas are the best to learn from. The courses are not cheap, but ask any cheese ... I want to become a cheese maker... where do I start? Making cheese at home can be somewhat overwhelming at first. There are so many different types, styles, and variations of cheese to choose from, it's tough to decide where to begin..
